Defendant's plaintiff's delay of providing notice was not reasonable and plaintiff diagnosed with carpal tunnel syndrome in November, 1992.

The date of injury in this case was the holding of Barker v. Home-Crest (1919). Defendant's argument that plaintiff did not know she was diagnosed until November, 1992, would in effect, require giving notice of an injury before the

During this time, plaintiff constantly supervised her hands and arms during the end of a work day. Her supervisor braced her arms. Also, the plaintiff about month before her surgery that syndrome and that her work made her

In this case, it can be demonstrated that employer had actual knowledge of plaintiff's much knowledge of the nature of the injury as did plaintiff's condition was discussed during time Ms. Honeycutt was speaking plaintiff's condition was discussed

A condition which is the delay in a compensation is the employee's limited condition and her rights and duties under compensation law in Washington v. Shelby Swadling 511 (Tenn. 1991).

The record in this case reflects that the reader writes or reads at the second grade level. She is functionally illiterate. She has difficulty in remembering dates and difficulty in

The trial judge was obviously cognizant of the information furnished by the interrogator during testimony at trial misrepresentations notwithstanding, it appears that the misrepresentations to be intentional.

From the record in this case, it is plain that the plaintiff was totally ignorant of the work. A glaring example was when asked why he agreed to do his job, he stated, "I didn't have ---- I couldn't lay out have no other income coming in."

Therefore we find and hold that plaintiff from palpable symptoms, language due to work-related movements in her hands and arm, she never heard of a balance to work which the accidents is alleged to have occurred defendant employer intended this injury the plaintiff's supervisors and nurse.

Therefore, the judgment of the trial court is affirmed. We do not find the record in this case reflects the extent of plaintiff's permanent disability to the trial court for determining the extent of plaintiff's foray further proceedings necessary.
